"The needs of the world's poor should be in the forefront of plans for tackling the Credit Crunch. But if we consider only the superficial and instrumental causes of poverty without any real attention to the human element, and treat this challenge as merely a series of technical questions – establishing structures, setting up trade agreements, and allocating funding impersonally – we will fail to help them.

What the fight against poverty needs are people who approach this challenge in a profoundly fraternal way and look to enable individuals, families and communities on journeys of authentic human development. And within that, the life Christian churches must continue to bring help, hope, vision, and dignity to many of the poorest "
